The first floor walls of the White House are faced with dressed brownstone ashlar. Above,

Boston. Houses. White, Charles T., 213 Commonwealth window frames and cornices are of the same light stone, and the walls are of brick. The gabled dormer in the attic echoes the treatment below by combining brownstone around the cornice-capped windows with brick and brownstone in the gable.
The elaborate swan's neck pediment over the slightly projected central window was of Georgian origin, whereas the tooth-shaped dentils under the raking cornice of the surrounding pedimented gable are medieval and suggestive of a brick gable treatment used earlier by the Dutch called "muisetanden" or "mouse teeth." It is also noteworthy that the three windows in the attic dormer relate to a similar grouping of windows in the swell bay on the first floor. Similarly, the windows of the second and Boston Houses.

White, Charles T. 213 Commonwealth third floors, though more widely spaced, are arranged in sets of three and so seem consistent with the windows above and below. The windows themselves were filled with currently fashionable large size lights which were rapidly replacing the smaller lights of an earlier period.

Three consecutive apartment blocks have been grouped in such a way that the outside units are mirror copies which counterbalance the taller, more symmetrical block that separates them. Ostensibly, the style was the currently popular Academic Brick with the facade treated in a modified French Academic or French 2nd Empire manner.

Polygonal bays rising through two floors and separated by an intermediate second and third story oriel effectively echo the ordering of the four and five story blocks of which they are a prominent part. The walls are of limestone and brick calculated to emphasize the vertical divisions of the facade and lend horizontal stability to the design. The fronts of the curb roofs, like the sides of the crown-like, grille topped, truncated pyramid that separates them, are of slate.

Neo-Grec detail in its design.
